The coffee chain Starbucks only does / has been doing / used to do charity work in the New York City area.

The CEO of Starbucks, Kevin Johnson, recently celebrated an important achievement in New York City. This achievement had nothing to do with introducing a new coffee product or reaching a new sales target high. Instead, the well-known coffee chain revealed that its FoodShare program has been <sup>1</sup> more than one million meals to food banks around the US. In fact, Starbucks has plans to increase their donation of all unsold, extra food to 50 million meals a year by 2020.

Johnson said the company's in-store employees came up with the idea to give food waste to local food banks. In the US, food is the biggest source of material to <sup>2</sup> in landfills and incinerators. Restaurants and grocery chains are responsible for much of this waste, which is unfortunate because nearly 42 million people in the US <sup>3</sup> from food insecurity.

Starbucks is working with Feeding American and City Harvest, two New York nonprofit organizations, to make certain their unsold food isn't <sup>4</sup> and will instead be used to feed the needy in the city. Executive director of City Harvest, Jilly Stephens, says that in addition to Starbucks, her organization has also worked with over 2,500 other businesses, including sandwich chain Pret a Manger, to make sure donated foods reach local food banks. However, some people think large restaurant chains <sup>5</sup> do more to donate their extra food.

Johnson referred to Starbucks' mission statement when he was asked if the company would <sup>6</sup> to be a voice for bigger, social topics. He said, "If you start with our mission statement: to inspire and nurture the human spirit—one person, one cup and one neighborhood at a time. That says it all. Things we can do that are good for the community, good for the country, good for other people—we are going to embrace those. That's not about making some political statement but doing what is <sup>7</sup>."
